Fifty years ago this week, there was a boller explosion in the axe handle factory then running in Greeneville in which the building was demolished and one man was killed by the falling timbers, while others had their legs broken and suffered other injuries. The cause of the explosion was not determined at once but was to be the subject for an investigation by the coroner's jury.

The same week the congressional naval committee came to New London to look at the site for a proposed navy yard. They made no report but left and went on to Boston after thoroughly looking over the situation on the Thames.
